A mystery Wellington family has shelled out a world record $8400 for a single bird feather.

The huia feather surpassed all expectations when it was sold at Webb's Auction House late last week.

"With an estimate of $500 to $700, a full room sat spellbound as the bidding rose to unprecedented heights between a determined phone bidder, and several floor bidders," Webb's managing director Neil Campbell said.

"Starting in $100 increments that quickly leaped into the thousands and came to rest at a world record price of $8400."

The feather's Porirua seller had had it in his family for generations. It was bought on Thursday at the Auckland auction by a "not uber-wealthy" Wellington family with a collection of Maori art and adornments, Mr Campbell said.

It is inconceivable that an Indian child growing up today would not know about Gandhi, just as it is impossible to imagine a child in the United States not knowing about Martin Luther King Jr, or a South African child Nelson Mandela. Yet generations of New Zealand children have grown up in ignorance of a man whose message and practice of peace and nonviolent protest preceded theirs by decades.
